THE POLO GROUNDS
Famous for both Pro and College Grid Thrills

NO major league baseball park in this country is so eminently suited for football as is the Polo Grounds. When the ball park was rebuilt after the destruction of the old wooden structure, the arena's future as a football terrain was taken into consideration and the highly successful result lies before you here today.

National League Goes Into Twenty-sixth Year as America's Pro Gridiron Power

THIS is the National Professional Football League's twenty-sixth season of competition. Born in modesty, nurtured in honesty of purpose and confidence in a belief that this country was ripe for professional football from coast to coast, the league has grown from small beginnings into the American professional gridiron power.

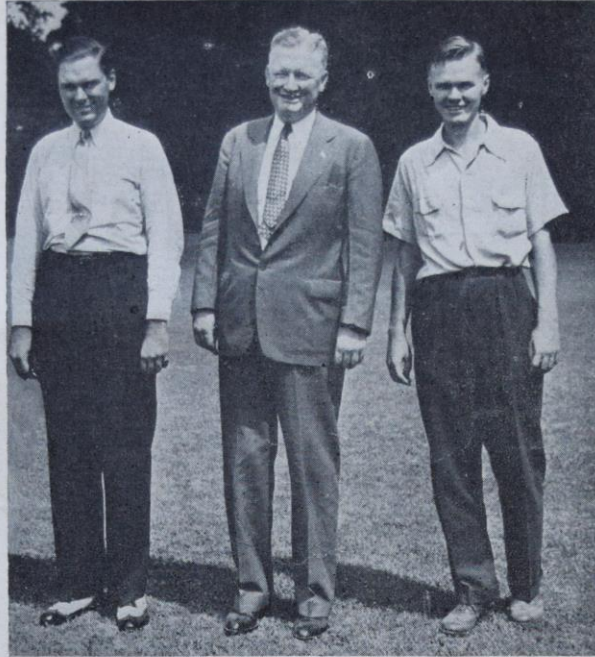

Down the years there has been a gradual increase of patronage. This has been more than justified by the type of football produced in the league, by the high grade of skill and keen competition.

During the war, the National League had to fight through against handicaps of reduced manpower, and continual service calls to players.

The wartime standard of play was not bad, but it was not up to that of before Pearl Harbor.

However, the fans made allowances and in 1944, piled up amazing attendance records.

With the war over, there will be higher standards of play, and unquestionably higher turnstile counts and growing popular appreciation of what the National League stands for.

THE MARA FAMILY
John, Tim and Wellington

Hello Again, Giant Fans!

WELL, here we are again at the old stand! The war is over, great players once again are available and their numbers will grow as the campaign unfolds itself.

Those of you who have been Giant football patrons need not be told that the best talent will be presented in New York uniforms. The best in playing skill, the best in coaching, and a fair deal from the management.

This combination has worked out to the common good of the customers and the front office and will persist to the utmost of the ability of those in charge of the New York gridiron enterprise.

The 1945 Giants make their bow to you here at the Polo Grounds with a schedule that promises keen competition, lots of thrills, and a view of the strength and the power of the National League.

Battling the Giants on the Polo Grounds turf will be the Washington Redskins, Cleveland Rams, Detroit Lions, Green Bay Packers and Philadelphia Eagles.

Steve Owen has a versatile, resourceful club, a mixture of veteran poise and youthful fire. It would not surprise anyone if he went into the inter-sectional playoff once again.

No effort, no expense, will be spared in the determination to bring the National League championship to New York.

Fifteenth Season for Steve Owen As Boss of Football Giants

STOUT Steve Owen, the strong man of the coaching family of the National Football League, today makes his 1945 Polo Grounds bow as the boss of the Giants.

Owen has gone into his fifteenth season as coach of the New York outfit. Fifteen campaigns studded with triumphs, with titles, with unexpected victories, with feats in the most modern phases of the game, and power in the basic, never-changing principles of football.

Steve Owen first showed up at the Polo Grounds as coach of the Giants in 1931. Leroy Andrews resigned in the thick of that campaign and much to everybody's amazement—including that of Steve himself—Tim Mara chose him to take over.

When the Giants entered the National League in 1925, Bob Folwell, who had coached at Penn and Washington and Jefferson, was the pilot.

The next year Dr. Joe Alexander, from Syracuse, succeeded Bob. In 1927, Earl Pottinger tried his hand at the job and in 1929, Andrews became the coach.

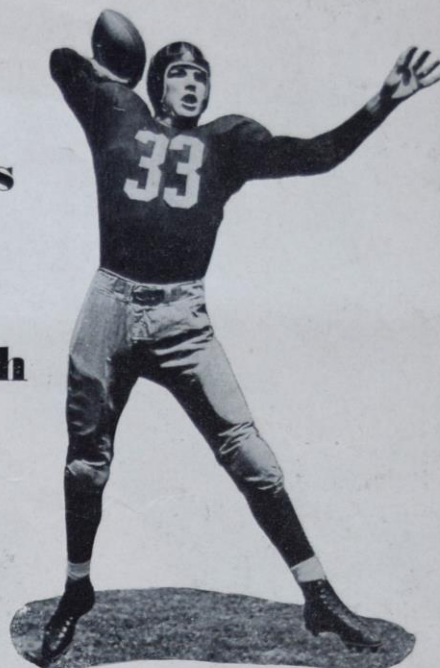

After a lot of muddling around for the proper combination, Tim Mara finally saw the right man in Stout Steve.

In 1931, the Giants finished with a .500 mark. The next season they played .400 football, but in 1933, the Polo Grounders won 11 and lost only 3, and topped the Eastern division of the National League. Steve was on his way.

THE Washington Redskins are the next attraction at the Polo Grounds. They invade the lair of the Giants next Sunday, and they come loaded for bear. The Redskins last week defeated the Pittsburgh team by 14 to 0, running up 22 first downs against 6.

Washington is headed this way with the great Sammy Baugh and Frankie Filchock sparking its ever-interesting and always dangerous air offensive.

The Redskins never have played an uninteresting game at the Polo Grounds.

Ken Strong, Giant of the Week!

KEN STRONG

THE veteran Ken Strong, kicker extraordinary, is the Giant of the Week. It was Ken who saved the day against The Yanks last Sunday in the Stadium, when the Giants got a 13 to 13 tie in the final minute of play.

After Johnny Weiss had blocked Scott Gudmundson's punt and had run to The Yanks's 18-yard mark, the Giants made five yards in three drives, and then called on the 38-year-old Strong.

Ken booted a field goal from 20 yards and gave the Giants their tie.

A bow to young Johnny Weiss, and the accolade to the staunch Ken Strong, the Giant of the Week—a grand guy whose football career has been loaded with laurels.

New Lines of Supremacy Forming Heighten Pro Football Interest

FROM September 23 right through December 9, the 1945 schedule of the National Football League shows a most interesting series of pairings, promising the keenest competition.

There are new lines of supremacy in the league and out of these grow new interests for the fans, bigger gates, finer competition, benefits to the gridiron all around.

For example, the Chicago Bears have been whipped thrice—31 to 21 at Green Bay, 17 to 0 at Cleveland, and 16 to 7 by the Cardinals.

The Brooklyn-Boston Yanks opened with a 28 to 7 victory over Pittsburgh and then, to demonstrate that this was no fluke, took the Washington Redskins by 28 to 20, and tied the Giants, 13 to 13.

The Giants opened their drive with a 34 to 6 triumph in Pittsburgh. Detroit, after starting with a success against the Chicago Cardinals, slipped back against the Packers, who then lost to Cleveland, while the Lions beat the Eagles.

Philadelphia started its campaign with a 21 to 6 victory against the Cardinals, who are back as a separate entity, as is Pittsburgh.

The Brooklyn and Boston teams have been combined, as the Yanks, for this season only.

THE war is over, but for many of the men who won it civilian clothes are still in the hope-chest. Many still in the Army wear their uniforms with special pride, because on them are marks of distinction earned on foreign battlefields. Take a look at the shoulders of our fighting men. Can you recognize their insignia?

Most varied of all shoulder patches are those which identify our ninety combat divisions, and none are worn more proudly than these, for the men of these divisions fought as footsoldiers, and suffered three-quarters of the casualties of all our armed forces.

First of all to see action was the Philippine Division. Its carabao patch is perhaps the least known of all, since the division was wiped out on Bataan. Only one other division has a name instead of a number. That is the Americal, formed on New Caledonia early in 1942 from members of a task force defending that Pacific island against a possible Jap attack. The division's name is a combination of "America" and "New Cal," and its shoulder patch shows the Southern Cross.

The 27th Infantry Division—New York's National Guard outfit which fought in the Gilbert and Mariana Islands, on Okinawa, and was among the first outfits to occupy Japan,—has the constellation Orion on its shoulder patch. The reason? Well, believe it or not, it seems that during the last war, when the 27th selected the design for its patch, its commander was Major General John O'Ryan.

Shoulder insignia first came into being during the last war, when the men of the 81st Infantry Division, now in the Pacific, arrived at Hoboken on their way to France with handsome wildcats on their shoulders. The practice was first frowned upon, but later the Wildcat Division was authorized to keep its patches, and other units followed suit.

Some insignia are relatively new. The 63rd Infantry Division, for instance, which captured Heidelberg just before the end of this war, calls itself the "Blood and Fire" Division and wears a blood-tipped, flame-wreathed bayonet. The nickname and the design were derived from a statement of the Allied leaders at the Casablanca Conference early in 1943, when they promised to make our enemies "bleed and burn" for their crimes against humanity.

There are interesting stories behind every shoulder patch. When the 79th Infantry Division rolled into Normandy, shortly after D Day, the French first thought that its soldiers were a special liberating force—because they wore the Cross of Lorraine on their shoulders. The 83rd Division, another veteran outfit of the European Theater of Operations, came from Ohio in the last war, and its patch featured a monogram of the letters O-H-I-O. Today the men of the division are no longer largely Ohioans.

The old covered-wagon days are recalled by the axe and tree of the 70th Infantry ("Trailblazer") Division, and the forests of the Northwest by the evergreen of the 91st Infantry ("Powder River") Division, which made its battle cry of "Powder River! Let 'er Buck!" known throughout Italy.

The 34th Division, which fought in Italy longer than any other, draws its red bull's head superimposed on a Mexican water bottle from its associations with the Southwest, where it trained before the last war. The 45th, another Southwestern outfit, had a swastika as its patch until a few years ago, but exchanged that for a thunderbird—like its predecessor, an old Indian symbol, but in somewhat better contemporary repute.

The 29th Division, which landed in Normandy on D Day, originally was composed of men from Virginia, Delaware, and Maryland, and its shoulder patch denotes the unity of those once embattled states by embodying the blue and grey colors of the Civil War in an old Korean symbol for good luck.

Some divisional insignia are easier to spot than others. A few use numbers—the 71st, 75th, and 100th, to name three. The 44th has varied the procedure slightly by putting the "4s" back to back, and the 7th Infantry Division has two "7s," one of them upside down and inverted. All of our sixteen armored divisions have the same patch, a red, yellow, and blue triangle, symbolizing the field artillery, cavalry, and infantry heritage of armor, with an Arabic numeral on it standing for the particular division concerned.

The 4th Infantry Division, which made the first landing on Normandy and later liberated Paris, has four ivy leaves on its patch and is often called the "Ivy" Division. Why? Well, when you take the Roman number for four—IV—and pronounce its letters separately, "ivy" is what you get.

Green Bay and Giants Advanced Into 1944 Football Championship Playoff

THE 1945 National Professional Football League campaign has unfolded itself against the background of a season of tremendous interest, the 1944 competition in which the Green Bay Packers defeated the New York Giants in the championship playoff, 14 to 7.

Easily the feature of the 1944 schedule was the amazing campaign of the Giants in the second half. On October 29, New York was beaten by Philadelphia, 24 to 17, and it looked as if Steve Owen's title chances had gone aglimmering.

However, on November 5, the Giants trounced Boston by 31 to 0. Then came a 21 to 21 tie with Philadelphia, and a smashing triumph over Green Bay, 24 to 0. This was one of the outstanding feats of National League competition of a decade.

On November 26, the Giants beat Brooklyn, 7 to 0, and on December 3, Owen's gang trounced the Washington Redskins, 16 to 13. A second victory over Washington, 31 to 0, sent the Giants into the playoff with Green Bay. Despite a valiant stand and a brilliant showing, the Polo Grounders were outdone.

At all stages of the schedule the Giants featured fight and brilliant coaching. The Brooklyn club, this season amalgamated with Boston, gained a reputation as the most luckless team the league had seen in years.

The famous Chicago Bears ran into their surprises on September 24, when they lost to Green Bay, 42 to 28, and November 19, when Detroit trounced the Halas outfit by 41 to 21.
